Galapagos Islands & Ecuador

Cruise & Tour

Daphne Island, Galapagos (cruising)

Located between the islands of Santa Cruz and Santiago, Daphne Island is restricted to most tourists but is a popular stop for scientists researching the unique qualities of the Galapagos finches.

Puerto Egas, Santiago

Puerto Egas has a long, lava shoreline where eroded rock formations house an excellent variety of wildlife, including marine and land iguanas as well as crabs and fur sea lions. This is not only a perfect place for snorkeling and seeing many species of tropical fish, but a great spot for both land and water photography.

Rabida Island

The high amount of iron contained in Rabida's lava gives a distinctive red cast to its beach, cliffs and steep slopes of volcanic cinders. White-cheeked pintail ducks live in a salt-water lagoon near the beach where brown pelicans and boobies have built their nests. Finches, doves, yellow warblers and mockingbirds can be found inland, but the trail can be steep and challenging.

Elizabeth Bay (Isabela Island)

The sea horse shape of Isabela Island is the product of six large volcanos merging into one landmass. With many rocky inlets accessible by dinghy, Elizabeth Bay is a great place to spot penguins and blue-footed boobies, and its clear water and profusion of marine life is perfect for snorkeling among schools of colorful fish.

Caleta Tagus (Isabela)

Located across from Fernandina Island, Tagus Grove has been a popular anchorage site on Isabela Island since the 1800s. Hiking the trails winding around Lake Darwin and up to a ridge is rather challenging, but the views are priceless.

Sullivan Bay (Santiago)

Sullivan Bay is a fascinating study in geology and volcanology. Your first step onto the black lava field will transport you to the surface of an alien planet with its wavy lava "ropes," gas bubbles, elephantine wrinkles and tree trunk molds permanently trapped in lava from the 1897 eruption.

Bartolome Island (Santiago)

Enjoy an exhilarating Zodiac-ride along the coast to see volcanic cones exposed by erosion and small lava tunnels that have flowed into the ocean. Hike across the Isthmus and search for Galapagos hawks, sea turtles and other shore birds. Snorkelers may see yellow tailed surgeonfish, parrot fish, and the small damsel fish.

Las Bachas (Santa Cruz)

The sand at Las Bachas is made of decomposed coral, making it white and soft and a favorite site for nesting sea turtles. The fine sand makes the shallow water too cloudy for snorkeling, but it's great for swimming. Look for the colorful Sally Lightfoot crabs, hermit crabs, flamingos, whimbrels, blue herons, semipalmated plovers and possibly a sea turtle.

North Seymour (Galapagos)

Zip along the coastline aboard a Zodiac as you search for Galapagos fur seals, lava herons, and swallow tailed gulls near North Seymour. You may also see blue-footed boobies, marine iguanas, and frigate birds. The geology of this area is quite interesting, due to the limestone trapped between two layers of basalt lava.

Puerto Baquerizo (San Cristobal)

The wharf and Shipwreck Bay at Puerto Baquerizo are always full of activity, and there's a small beach in the center of town. Before you dive in, please note it is designated for sea lions only, an example of the protection and reverence the people of the islands feel for them. To learn more about the culture of the Galapagos, you can head to the Interpretation Center. And if you want a beach for humans—just ask your naturalist.

Cerro Brujo (San Cristobal)

Cerro Brujo (Wizard's Hill) Beach is a beautiful white coral beach on San Cristobal, where you can observe gulls, brown pelicans, blue-footed boobies and marine iguanas.

Kicker Rock (San Cristobal) (cruising)

An eroded lava cone split in two and rising from the sea is the iconic rock formation known as Kicker Rock. Its Spanish name "León Dormido," literally translates to "Sleeping Lion," a nod to its profile when viewed from the south.

Puerto Ayora (Santa Cruz)

Visit the Charles Darwin Research Station to learn about the conservation here in the Galapagos and see the Giant Tortoise rearing program. You also have the option of a hike in the highlands of Santa Cruz to observe giant tortoises in the wild. Feel free to shop in the town.
